THE EMPLOYMENT POSITION AND GOVERNMENT ACTION.

Following are extracts from the text of the Minister's statement in the House of Commons on 3rd May to questions on the employment situation. Particular attention is drawn to this statement which deals with many points of considerable interest.

Perhaps I may best answer the questions put to me by giving the answers under four or five heads - ex-Servicemen, disablement, training centres, appointments, an employment areas. We must consider the switchover from war to peace. In mid-1939 we had a total working population of 19,750,000. Out of that population 557,000 were in the Forces, auxiliary services, civil defence and police. At the end of February, 1946, the total working population was 20,695,000. But out of that number we had 3,249,000 in the various Services, Civil Defence, National Fire Service, and the police. So there is still a great proportion of the potential man and woman power of the country doing what in a sense may be called unproductive work. They are not producing goods for the community.

At mid-1939 we had 1,270,000 registered unemployed, just before the war. It is important to remember that these were the registered unemployed, because there were some thousands who were not registered, who, seeing nothing coming along, got tired of signing. At the present moment - up to March - there are 372,000 unemployed. That is far too many. I will make some further reference to this in a moment, which will let the Committee see we are reaching a point where unemployment is levelling out and not increasing. It is perhaps a very minor indication and we do not place too much reliance on the figures until we can see those for another month or two ahead. Since mid-1945 unemployment has increased by 269,000. The increase between February and March was 16,000 and lower than the average rate of increase during the preceding months.

At mid-1943, the peak period, those employed on the manufacture of equipment, supplies, etc., for the Forces numbered 5,180,000. By the end of February, 1946, there were 1,385,000.

And so there is some considerable reduction, which is continuing, and which we hope will rapidly continue. Before the end of the year, we hope that conditions in the world will make it perfectly safe for us to rely on the United Nations Organisation, giving us some hope that in future we need not depend so much on armaments. The totals for February show that the numbers employed on the manufacture of equipment and supplies for the Forces had fallen by 2,502,000, which is 64 per cent., as against the numbers employed on civilian manufacture and services had increased by

At mid-1943, the peak period, those employed on the manufacture of equipment, supplies, etc., for the Forces numbered 5,180,000. By the end of ~~February~~ ^{January}, 1946, there were 1,385,000.

And so there is some considerable reduction, which is continuing, and which we hope will rapidly continue. Before the end of the year, we hope that conditions in the world will make it perfectly safe for us to rely on the United Nations Organisation, giving us some hope that in future we need not depend so much on armaments. The totals for February show that the numbers employed on the manufacture of equipment and supplies for the Forces had fallen by 2,502,000, which is 64 per cent., or that the numbers employed on civilian manufacture and services had increased by 2,540,000, or about 24 per cent. A good deal of this work, as been previously indicated, is on export.

On the question of unemployment, the general position in the country is one of shortage of labour. The total number of insured persons registered as unemployed on 11th March was 371,900, which represents 2.7 per cent. of the insured population. That is satisfactory as far as it goes, but the fact is that in those old distressed areas, now known as Development Areas, the percentages in some cases are considerably higher. We are trying to meet that position, but it is not my business to give exact details on what the Board of Trade are doing in the matter. In regional offices there are officers of the Board of Trade and others, who not only work closely together, but have been given a large measure of local responsibility, so that they can move forward on any project without coming to headquarters for instructions. That work is going ahead, and there is co-operation between the Ministry of Labour and the Board of Trade.

On/

On the whole, this process of reconversion is going very well. The increase of employment in the home civilian industries and services since 1945 was over 2,000,000 and the numbers employed on manufacturing for the export trade, in 1946, exceeded the mid-1939 figure by 52,000, or just over five per cent. That is what we are pressing on with, and we have to get the export trade going to make good our overseas loss of investments.

As an illustration of the general situation in the Midland Region, there are five jobs outstanding for every two unemployed workers. In London and the North Midlands, the ratio is still higher. Here in London, we are crying out for workers, and in other areas workers are crying out for jobs. I have visited exchanges in Scotland and I found that in two towns, which were about 50 miles apart, that in one there were jobs which could not be filled, and in the other unemployed who could not find work. It is physically possible to move the towns closer together, we could have solve that problem.

When we went into the question of why these unemployed men could not be moved, we found that it was because many of them had children going to school and homes to keep, and it was difficult to tear them up by the roots and send them away; and even if we could have sent them to the other town, there were not sufficient houses there for them to live in. The same consideration apply in the development areas. South Wales and Scotland are the two areas that are giving us the greatest concern. I think that so far as Cumberland is concerned, the position has been largely overcome. I do not say that it has been overcome at the moment, but sufficient industries have decided to go there, and plans have definitely been made, so that when those industries can be got working in three, four or six months, they will take up all the local people who are unemployed. The position does not look quite so good in other areas, but it is improving.

What is the cause of the present unemployment in these areas? One of the causes is the lack of diversity of industry in the pre-war days. Towns had to exist on one industry alone, and when anything went wrong with that industry, there was unemployment. Therefore, the need is to encourage industries of other types to go to towns which have been one industry towns. Then, there is the turnover of employment, which is inevitable, owing to the change from war to peace.

Training

When we come to the question of training people who are unemployed we must look at their background to find out what kind of training they would have to undergo. Another of the problems that has arisen about training, which has already been referred to, is that some of the men who have been trained are still waiting for jobs. That is one of our problems. Then, there is another complaint that we do not take in for training as many people as want to be trained. Obviously, the first thing, and the sensible thing, is to make a survey of the industry and find out what it is possible for that industry to absorb by way of new trainees. If the number is 100,200 or 5,000 we say we will take that number and train them. It would be no good to the industry the trainee, or the Government Scheme, if we were to train people, and then find that they were pushed on to the labour market, and that, if they could get a job, someone with longer experience was being pushed out.

Development Areas

I have only the overall figures here of what is being done for the development areas through the system of inducing firms to take up work in them. Take a firm on the edge of London, for example, which sees opportunities of business, perhaps foreign business, and wants to develop and build a factory that will take in another 500 workers. It would be very foolish to allow that firm to build a new factory on the spot and go into the market for another 500 workers, stealing them from the other firms, which would be left high and dry, when they could just as easily put up the factory 100, 200 or 250 miles away, where there were unemployed workers and where they would not be competing with anybody.

To give the employers credit, the Board of Trade officials who interview them have found them most willing to co-operate in the vast majority of cases. All they are anxious to do is to get the job going and except where there are most exceptional reasons for allowing the business to develop on the existing site they co-operate. What has been the result? Development completed or approved up to the last available date will find employment for about 247,000. These are already moving ahead, spread over South Wales, the Southern part of Scotland and other development areas. I want to say at once that we are not satisfied; enough has not by any means been done because we are still a long way behind, but after all it took us about five or six years to build up our war potential, and it may take us a little longer that the next eight or nine months since the end of the war, to attain our peacetime potential.

These plans for the development areas provide as follows: Schemes approved up to 31st March, will find work in the North Eastern District for 67,500 in South Wales and Monmouthshire for 89,500, and in Scotland for 48,700. We have not done so well for Scotland as for other areas, but the thing is moving. The development for Cumberland will provide work for 11,500, and will completely wipe away the pocket of unemployment there.

Training Centres

I should like now to say a word or two on the many points which have been raised about the training centres. First, we had to get our instructors. We concentrated on the building industry in the main, in all its phases. This work began under my predecessors and was a scheme thought out largely in the Ministry and not outside the industry. There was the question of getting the necessary instructors and materials, and therefore we concentrated on those places where we could get going immediately. I ask the Committee to accept the assurance that we are trying to get other places for our trainees to work.

It is interesting to note the difference between the men who are being trained, and apprentices. Apprentices are young boys such as well were once. At that age, we were not putting in a hard day's work. Here we have men who have been up against it, and have had a pretty stiff time. They have come back and have gone into the training centres with the determination to suck as much information as they can out of their instructor. They are always on the job - never playing about. It does one's heart good to see them and the work they are doing. For six months they concentrate completely on the work of the training centre and, in addition, they go to technical schools at night and continue the work there. They not only do the work with their hands but they make notes of the technical instruction. Employers have come along and said they did not believe that men with six months training could have done the work. Those who have been satisfied with men, have taken them out and given them jobs. They could give the men an improver's wage, but many have quickly given them the proper wage. All this was possible only after negotiations - begun before the end of the war - with the employers, who co-operated most heartily and with the unions who found the instructors. They given us all the assistance possible and taken men willingly when their training was finished. The thing is going very successfully. We are pressing on and we shall not be satisfied until we get a great number more than we have now.

It does one's heart good to see them and the work they are doing. For six months they concentrate completely and absolutely on the work of the training centre and, in addition, they go to technical schools at night and continue the work there. They not only do the work with their hands but they make notes of the technical instruction. Employers have come along and said they did not believe that men with six months training could have done the work. Those who have been satisfied with men, have taken them out and given them jobs. Agencies

There were some other reference to ex-Servicemen which I want to mention. There is this problem of the Agencies that are out to catch these men. I am very glad that this question has been raised because it will once more help to draw attention that there are such agencies. This is what the Ministry and the Government face - if we want these men to come to employment exchanges in the place of those other bogus agencies, if I may for the moment use that term, we must provide an exchange which will deliver the goods and be of service to them. We want to see that the Government can give that service, and we want to keep the men from getting those things that will be of no advantage to them or anybody else.

Clothing

We do not like the way in which some of our ex-Servicemen have been caught outside the demobilisation centres by men who have come along and offered fancy prizes to them for their bundle of clothes and have got away with it, largely because the demobilised Serviceman did not know how difficult it was to get clothes when he /returned returned to "Civvy Street".

The Appointments Department.

I have here some figures about what the Appointments Department had done. It may not have done all that is required, and it certainly has not done all that the Ministry of Labour requires to be done. However, the question is whether it justifies the suggestion made that it serves no useful purpose. Perhaps the figures I am about to give will help the Committee to decide this matter. Since May, 1945, the Appointments Department succeeded in placing in employment something like 27,500 applicants. It may be it could have done more, but that is what has been done. The Committee must remember that 190,000 officers have been demobilised from the Forces, but only about 5 per cent. come to us in the Appointments Offices, and are unemployed or a position. Then we get the difficulty of the regular officer who is over 45 years of age. It is not the Ministry who will not give him a job; it is the employers of labour who say the man is too old. We in the Ministry do not like that, and, therefore, what we have to do is to get hold of a better salesman, who will be able to sell that type of worker to the employer and the local authorities.

Linked up with this, there are the Further Education and Training Schemes. The Business Training Scheme is just in its infancy and it is beginning to move. I think it is going to be good. We have got 600 or 700 men started on a course of business training. It is a special course where younger men are trained for the higher positions in business above those of clerk and foreman. Here we find the employer anxious naturally to get the bright young fellow who went into the Services, passed through the ranks and got an executive position. Employers hope they will have the same sort of capacity in business. It is for us to try at the same time to get them to take the older men as well. We try to do that and we will continue to do so until we have attained some success.

Displacement Scheme.

Ministers ought not to have any favourites, but if I have any favourite in this matter it is this disabled workers scheme. The act was passed by the Coalition Government with the general consent of everybody. This scheme is going well. The two per cent. quota is being put across, and is being accepted by employers with practice no difficulty. The trouble is that when one reaches many big industries and big firms one finds that sometimes they have already got up to 16 per cent.

The two per cent. will not be sufficient. The figure will certainly have to go up to four per cent., but registrations are not yet complete. Here again we find the same difficulty that we have found elsewhere. We put out all the publicity we can regarding disabled persons in employment to register, yet even in our own Ministry to have to go around, dig them out and say, "Why do you not register?" I think we have got over the fear that registration will be a deterrent to continued employment, and the register is increasing. The numbers registered as disabled who were unemployed on 1st May were 53,540 of whom 44,294 were adjudged to be capable, despite disability of work under ordinary competitive conditions, so that the register is going ahead. There is much more to be done.

The other reference in this connection was to the Government factories, the Disabled Workers Employment Corporation. That is actively proceeding. The first is now in operation at Bridgend, having started last week. The next will be opened this

The Government, through the Corporation, or the Corporation through the Government, have plans for 60 of these factories, several of them in the South Wales area, where they will deal with the silicosis cases and cases of that character, and there are others of a kind which will fit in with the industries in the different areas. This scheme is working well.

Chief Clerk please note

1. When Age and Service Groups are called forward for Medical Examination, a closing date for each Group is stated.

2. Numerous instances are occurring of units submitting AFsw 3149 to Surgeon (ADMS) after this closing date. On occasions AFsw 3149 are submitted within 72 hours of the calling forward into Transit of the Group concerned.

3. In the past every endeavour has been made to carry out such medical examinations so as not to penalise the individual since the fault has usually lain with the unit concerned.

4. Shortage of staff at MI Rooms now precludes any interference with scheduled examination programmes, and AFsw 3149 submitted late will have to take turn after programmes previously arranged.

5. Orders are being issued in the course of the next few days for the calling forward for Medical Examination of AS Groups 33 and 34. Closing dates for submission of AFsw 3149 to Surgeon (ADMS) are clearly stated. OSC Units will comply with these instructions and an explanation will be required in all cases where AFsw 3149 are submitted to Surgeon (ADMS) after closing date.
