1. Since the invasion of Italy by the Allied Armies an elaborate military telephone and telegraph system has been constructed, connecting all the main centres within the occupied territory. This has been rendered possible by three main factors:
 - (a) The relatively slow pace of operations.
 - (b) A considerable portion of the civil communication system was left intact by the enemy.
 - (c) It has been possible to employ the whole of the signal personnel resources to restore communications in a comparatively small portion of the country.
2. The result has been that commanders and staffs have become accustomed to a lavish scale of line communications and there has been no pressing need for economy in the use of the communication system.
3. When the armies move forward there will be a period when the scale of line communications will be drastically reduced, particularly in the forward areas. This will be inevitable, since not only is time required to extend the system, but charge will undoubtedly be very much higher than previously. Furthermore existing resources will be more stretched as the advance proceeds.
4. Everyone must, therefore, be prepared to work on a very much reduced telephone service, and to rely in the forward areas to a large extent on R/T. The telegraph service will also be more dependent on the use of wireless channels, which have a smaller traffic capacity than line channels and are subject to greater delays owing to the necessity of encoding. The communication service must therefore be used with the maximum of economy, and the following rules will be observed:
 - (a) Telephone calls will be initiated only as a necessity and not as a matter of convenience.
 - (b) Telephone conversations will be initiated only as a necessity and not as a
